“Blind, Deaf & Dumb”

The media, the middle-class and the construction of poverty

Dr. Eoin Devereux & Dr. Michael Breen, University of Limerick
In this paper we consider how the Irish broadcast and print media construct stories about poverty.

It stems from an ongoing interest in the ideological role played by the mass media and draws upon a neo-Marxist theoretical framework.

How media discourses about poverty change over time?

While we recognize the power of audiences we also recognize the power of the mainstream media to set agendas and shape public discourse.
Changing Contexts...

- 1992-1996 Study
  - High rates of relative poverty.
  - High rates of unemployment and long-term unemployment (18%+)
  - The 1994 LiS Survey found that between 9 and 15% of households experience poverty.

- 2000-2001 Study
  - In the wake of unprecedented economic growth rates.
  - Lowering of overall unemployment levels (3.7%).
  - The 1997 LiS Survey showed persistent long-term unemployment & high rates of relative poverty.
  - Growing dependency in labour market on non-nationals.
All of the published research on attitudes to poverty in Ireland reveal two main kinds of constructions within public discourse:

The Deserving Poor  (God’s Poor)

The Undeserving Poor  (Devils’s Poor)

Devils and Angels Study 1992-96

- Study of RTE’s coverage of poverty on RTE1 and Network 2 channels.
- Combined critical content analysis with an ethnographic approach.
- Examined factual, fictional and fund-raising television.
- It had a particular focus on the ideological construction of poverty stories.
- The study concluded that poverty coverage on television is constructed in such a way as to be non-threatening to the status quo.
Devereux (1998) argued that RTE’s television coverage of poverty was based upon dominant ideological explanations.

Coverage was reductive; it relied upon a liberal rather than a critical discourse; the poor were largely voiceless and invisible across the range of genres analysed; poverty was decontextualised and stories about the poor relied upon personal and individual rather than structural explanations; the mode of address of much of this coverage was to a presumed comfortable middle-class audience.

The dichotomy of the deserving/God’s poor and undeserving/Devil’s poor needed to be added to with a new categorization the Angels or saviours of the poor. Following Propp (1928) and Sorenson (1991) we can say that the Angels are mythologized into heroic characters who become synonymous with assisting the poor.

The new poor of the early 1990s were the middle-class.
The new poor

- ‘The New Poor’
  - The rise of unemployment into the middle-classes.
  - The rise in mortgage interest rates.
  - Newsworthiness?
  - The novelty factor.
  - Their level of organisation/articulacy.

- Discourses around the new poor?
  - They have become economically poor because of forces outside of their control.
  - Cause of new poverty is structural & not for individual/personal reasons as in stories concerning the ‘old poor’.
‘These people have made a go of life...’

- Story: The problems facing mortgage-holders in Galway City.
  - The crisis facing the middle-classes of Galway ‘will cause bigger problems than the activities of moneylenders this Christmas.’
  - They are ‘the poor of the PAYE sector and they have no medical cards...they have never had to go to the St. Vincent De Paul. These people have made a go of life and tried to keep it there...they are forced into being the new poor.
  - Immediate political action is demanded in the form of full mortgage tax relief. They have fallen into poverty through no fault of their own.
  - The task at hand is to save the new poor from losing their houses and to ‘try and keep their dignity together.’

- Structure of news report:
  - Opening shot of a prosperous Galway housing estate with large houses.
  - Houses are bathed in a late evening fog.
  - Interview with a representatives from the St. Vincent De Paul and the Combined Resident’s Association in Galway.
  - No representative examples of the new poor.

Conclusions

• Media coverage ignores poverty OR focuses on marginal issues, not systemic ones
• The new poor in Ireland are Immigrants (2001)
• Immigrants & Travellers conflated
• Both groups covered in marginal terms
• No systemic evaluation of cause of poverty
• Coverage can be very negative (pace length)
• Media content reflected in public opinion.
